When the First Movement finishes,

the tuba huffing,
the violin trembling,
the clarinet clearing its nose,

where does that last note go?

It hovers above the orchestra’s damp collars,
creased skirts,
their wilted black bowties,

then flies up,

out,

brushing a cheek,

skimming an ear,

sailing the hall on currents

of sighs

then slowly drifts back

down

down
to perch on the bow’s arm,
the oboe’s long black toe;

when the rustling stops,
the papers settle
and the players find their place,

it throws back its head,
opens its mouth,
its throat,

eyes the baton

rising.

© 2019 Copyright Jill Solnicki
* to be used for the Lirit New Composition Award, with permission by the author